Show HN: A framework that ensures your app and server are in sync - konradb ===== konradb Hi everyone, This is a small team that has been working on a serverless event-driven database & storage platform for the past few years and we are finally ready to show it to the world. This is our first product out the door! Excited to see how it goes! ~~~ anilgulecha Would be great to see some explanations about its main features, is it different than firebase, and what's the advantage. ~~~ konradb Good guestion. Nimbus is a client/server architecture. We handle the client side of things so you don't need to worry about those. You also don't have to write server-side code. With Nimbus, you can just store the data you want in memory, disk or database and provide whatever back-end services you want. One of the most useful parts of Nimbus is that we provide a common database API (others will do as well) and have a client/server sync layer built in. We also provide bindings for the popular Clojure and Python frameworks. The advantage is that you can run whatever services you want and have Nimbus provide the synchronization through our API. Because there is no server-side sync, you
