The impact of educational attainment on life satisfaction and stress in older people in Taiwan: a cross-sectional study. Many studies have shown that higher education is positively associated with well-being; however, few studies have considered the impact of age and education together on life satisfaction. This study explores the association between the respondents' educational attainment and their life satisfaction as well as their stress. Data are taken from the third wave of the Taiwan Longitudinal Survey on Aging (TLSA), which contains a subsample of community-dwelling people aged 60 and over. Information on respondents' age, gender, marital status, health condition and life satisfaction is positively associated with stress. Gender and health condition were also found to be significantly associated with stress. The results show that gender, education,
