A: This seems to be a case of an Excel-generated hyperlink, probably by a macro, that has been corrupted. Open the file in Word (or any other application that can edit the file) and press F2 to 'try' to correct the problem. This may or may not work, but the chances are that it will. If not, you can take a copy of the file, make a hex dump of it with a hex editor (I use Notepad++ for this), view that in Word, and then paste the stream into Excel. The rogue hyperlink should be highlighted in the document and you can remove it. On the ICN framework for networked health information systems. The interoperability of health information systems has been recognized as a key issue in the field of health informatics in the last few years. At the same time, research has been focused on achieving semantic interoperability rather than integration as the main goal. However, the other important element to achieve semantically interoperable health information systems is the integration of data and content through information and content networks and metadata and their compatibility. Therefore, a detailed conceptual framework is required for designing new health information systems. In this paper, a framework for networked health information systems is proposed, using the information and content network (ICN) paradigm. The ICN provides a unified conceptual basis for modeling, reasoning, and performing knowledge processing for information and content networks and has been introduced recently in many areas including e-commerce, resource discovery, and semantic processing. As a result, the framework for networked health information systems comprises six building blocks: ontology-based frameworks, semantics-based frameworks, information standards for health information networks, information networks, content networks, and interprocess communication.Q: How to efficiently generate a large number of arrays in Python? I have a huge set of arrays (100000x100000), each one with a size of Mx100x100 where M is a number between 1 and 100 (but is not fixed). I want to generate all of them (many arrays). I tried to generate such a collection of arrays with the following code : # Some arrays M = 1 N = 100 a1 = np.array([np.random.rand(M,N) for i in range(N)]) a2 = np.array([np.random.rand(M,N) for i in range(N)
