If I were to interview a subject about their experience with the Rebel Alliance, their last sentence would likely be, "but I really liked the DC-17 rifles." The DC-17 was more than just a battlefield weapon for the commandos, it was an extension of their sense of self. The DC-17 was a weapon that let them appreciate the freedom they enjoyed living in the Rebellion and the joy of being a being of the Force. A similar empathetic connection was created with their DC-17m rifles.^[1] [5] with several painful exceptions. [6] In fact, any and all attached DC-17m rifles would be destroyed in a fire or explosion, even those with their attachments already installed. The attachment bay on the DC-17m's stock was sufficiently large to hold the two laser mines that made up the attachment, and also the 10-round magazine for the rifle, but not bigger. However, if somebody was foolish enough to try to cram the DC-17m's attachment bay with things too big for it, then, in most cases, the DC-17m would still function normally. [7]
