using social engineering to gain access to the securid infrastructure. the first step was to email two phishing messages to two groups of relatively low level employees. the subject was recruiting 2011, and the messages contained an excel malware that executed a zero-day attack against the employees' machines. despite the excel file being junk-folded, at least one employee fetches it from junk and opens it, executing the malware and compromising their machine. Prior to the phishing messages, it's presumed that the attacker used social media such as LinkedIn to map the company's targets by name, and that they guessed the email addresses using a familiar pattern such asfirst.lastrsa.com. once the malware was installed, the attacker perused files on the target system and accessed internal rsa web sites to determine higher value targets. with that information in hand, they moved toward the higher value targets and eventually to the data they were seeking.
