Admittedly, Lightroom is undeniably in an older age than Photoshop. In 2010, Lightroom 4 was launched after Photoshop CS6. This was quite recent, considering Adobe quickly started releasing new features and software updates in 2011. New features were simply added to the previous versions, and only minor things were done. However, during this period, Lightroom became the most popular standalone image editing solution for the masses. They kept revising what was promised in the previous major version and adding new features. Some time in late 2012 or 2013, Lightroom 5 was launched with the tagline, “Lightroom 5 can do everything Photoshop can do.” It quickly achieved a lot of popularity and recognition. Lightroom 5’s main difference from earlier versions was its newly added integration to mobile devices like tablets. Some people are not satisfied with the lack of a mobile backup facility like Photoshop Touch. You have to use a PC or Mac to go back to work at home. Lightroom 5 may not have the same functionality as Photoshop Touch, but it at least provides a better mobile connection to your photos. Although the name of the new version is light, most of the additions were anything but. Here’s what you have in Lightroom 5: Image Naming & Description, Multishot, White Balance Control, Panorama, HDR, Lens Correction, Lens Distortion Control, Pinning, Label Retouch, Panorama, Versions, Undo History, Structure-in-Context, Flatten Documents, Non-destructive Layers, Smart Objects and Blending Modes.

In the case of the web, however, Photoshop is also the only application that lets you:

- Use the full color space of your working files in the browser
- Convert content to meet web standards

This functionality is available in Photoshop CC and is one of the reasons for the application's popularity. It's important to note that this is a very basic subset of Photoshop that works on the web. For the full experience, users should download the desktop version of Photoshop. We've been hearing the rumors for years, and most of us would have heard Philip Greenspun's "It Depends" blog post. Before you even start thinking why yes/no, you can consider this a warning: the Photoshop decision is a really hard one to make. Let's break it down a bit. The functionality you are asking about is part of the Adobe Creative Suite (CS) Desktop which is the basis of the Photoshop that you are familiar with. It's most similar to 8.5 but integrates with the rest of Adobe's ecosystem. CS covers pretty much everything Photoshop has to offer. It's the foundation of the Adobe Creative Cloud. It's also the basis of the free and pro versions of Adobe Lightroom. If you can imagine it—and move it around—that probably makes it. If you can’t imagine it, but want to know what it’s like, Google can help. Google is the computer that Photoshop calls “a.a.p.i.d.” (another intelligence that helps you turn your ideas into images). Adobe describes it as “an image-recognition engine.” It quickly learns what’s in pictures you upload to Google Photos and tells you what it thinks you may have captured or created. You can use this information to move around, improve, or create a new version of any of your photos. e3d0a04c9c
